

The Herald begins this morning the publication of photographs of members of an extensive bachelor club of Salt Lake, a company of men who were overlooked in the matrimonial rush of the leap year of 1908. The club is quite exclusive, consisting of many of Salt Lake's most desirable young and near-young men, and membership is limited to those whose pictures will appear from time to time. Requests have been many for a display of the manly beauties of the city, and as so many of the beauties among the fair sex have already been shown, it seemed only right that both sides should be presented.

Surely in the realm of fashion at least there is nothing new under the sun. Now comes the news that the Directorate gown was not the invention of a Parisian designer, but really emanated from the brain of a certain lovely lady of Burnham, some 200 years ago. And the cause thereof (all male prudes to the contrary), was the fact that the Burnham women had temporarily lost some of their well known attractiveness, and as a consequence the matrimonial market was somewhat slow.

Of course, the style must have had the desired effect, for we have Rudyard Kipling's own word for it that "There's a neater, sweeter maiden, and you'll remember that it was a 'Burnham girl,' too. If there is anything that would conduce to some sort of at least of neatness it would be the style so summarily disapproved of by the world at large.

And still, on the never-failing subject of fashions, isn't it good news to learn that the real Parisians and the American women in Paris are rejecting the huge monstrosities of headgear which are sent over here as real Paris hats? This, from across the waters, would seem to set the pace, but of course now that everyone has purchased her spring creation, the news will have to be taken with a grain of salt.

When the milliners began to display their spring wares the shops were filled with hats which resembled inverted waste paper baskets. They were not unlike the 'cossack' hats which found favor for a time in the winter, but the shape was much exaggerated.

To enhance the ugliness little or no trimming was added to the bare shape of the hat. The smart French women looked these hats over and decided they would not do. The result was that the first spring days in Paris saw a revival of the enormous flat hats trimmed with flowers or ostrich plumes, which have always been favorites here.

The French actresses followed the example and no inverted waste paper baskets could be found in the theatres.

But the final blow to the milliners was struck when Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish and some other prominent American women positively refused even to try on hats of this kind.

This decision by Mrs. Fish was not unique. Practically every American woman who is buying the new season's hats in Paris has refused to take the advice of the milliner and convert herself into a fright. A strange part of the whole matter is that nothing else can be seen in the smart shops of the Rue de la Paix but the inverted waste baskets, while not one can be seen in the public and private places where fashion congregates socially.

The result probably will be that the whole cargo of hats will be sold to American buyers and dumped into shops in America where women may be persuaded they are buying the latest Parisian fashions.

This from the Los Angeles Express will interest Salt Lakeers:

J. W. Clawson, who leaves about the middle of the month for New York, where he intends to open a studio and remain permanently, is one of the prominent exhibitors at the Fine Arts league exhibition, and one of the few local artists whose work has been hung "on the line." Mr. Clawson's portrait of the well known Mrs. Haskins has been given the position of honor on the west wall, where it shows to good advantage, somewhat, however, to the detriment of the Innis painting, which hangs next to it.

One fair maiden in Trenton, N. J., has evidently been improving her mind by means of The Salt Lake Herald, for she appeared, it is said, on Easter Sunday with a wonderful headgear fashioned from a commodious waste paper basket and a feather duster. Now, if the ideas embodied in the other drawings are utilized, there will be added interest in headgear.

There is some talk of giving a masquerade at the University club early in May, so that the cotillion will prove perhaps only a starter, instead of a finish, for the gaiety of the dancing season. The matter is still in the talk-about stage, but with such an energetic social committee it is bound to be a certainty before long.

Best Way to Make Cocoa.

The common way to make cocoa is to boil milk with the cocoa while it is being prepared. In using McDonald's Soluble Cocoa, better results are obtained by following the directions given on the can. According to these directions no milk is used in making the cocoa, but is added just before serving. A prominent housekeeper of this city uses the following recipe, and has been very successful:

A teaspoonful and one-half of sugar is placed in a teacup, to which is added a half teaspoonful of McDonald's Cocoa. This is mixed thoroughly, and boiling water is then added. The cocoa should be stirred while the water is being poured in, as this dissolves the cocoa quickly and helps to retain the delicious flavor. Cream or milk is then added, as desired. This method is used by the best soda fountains and has been proven to be much better than the old-fashioned way of boiling milk, water and cocoa together. In using McDonald's Soluble Cocoa, a half teaspoonful should be used, on account of its purity and great strength. Cocoa made according to these directions makes an ideal drink for family use at all meals, and since McDonald's Cocoa has been placed on the market a great many families use it exclusively in place of tea or coffee.
